In Gansian terms, our relationship to the Sacred is conceived in more human terms, in that it takes into account our desires: We love the sacred center because we desire and worship it; at the same time, we resent it because we know we can never have it. Since this is true, Gutzkow draws the conclusion that the task which the novelle sets for itself can be accomplished only through the agency of humor. Humor the highest gift of literary creative power and one which even writers of note possess only sparingly.
